Course Content:

- Course Outline:

This BIP is part of an increasingly closer collaboration between the universities that make up the Ulysseus alliance and it comes as a result of a shared concern about journalism and communication studies in the European context. The main objective of this course is to offer undergraduate, master's, and doctoral students a deeper knowledge and understanding of media production processes within the current information ecosystem and the editorial decisions made when reporting citizenship about crises and emergencies that directly impact social cohesion and the normal functioning of democratic societies. Within this broader objective, this course will address, with the guidance of academics, expert professionals in the field, and other local participants, the social responsibility of the media outlets in the coverage of natural disasters, migration crises, conflicts affecting defense and security, and public health emergencies, such as those that have recently occurred in Europe and the rest of the world.

From this approach, this programme will provide participants with tools, solutions, working methods, and ethical guidelines for reporting rigorously and accountably on such relevant and socially sensitive situations. This deontological dimension is crucial at a time when disinformation spreads easily through social media and digital platforms where a significant portion of the population, especially younger generations, spends more time accessing news. Clearly, disinformation is one of the main challenges facing the European Union countries in the 21st century.

Moreover, the objectives and content of this course are connected to the European Council's Strategic Agenda 2024-2029 (<https://www.consilium.europa.eu/en/european-council/strategic-agenda-2024-2029/>) that set the EU's priorities and try to tackle structural challenges such as strengthening democracies through the protection of free and pluralistic media and civil society; reinforcing crisis prevention and response capacities to protect citizens against different crises, such as natural disasters and health emergencies; or investing in skills, training and education to better secure its long-term prosperity and competitiveness.

The course adopts a transnational and interdisciplinary approach, and it combines innovative learning methods such as online and interactive in-person sessions with international and multidisciplinary teams. All this means adding value to the courses already offered at participating universities and students to gain a solid knowledge and practical skills to combat disinformation, act ethically and find solutions to report about crises and emergencies in a responsible way.

The course is designed as an intensive programme combining a virtual and a physical stages. The virtual phase consists of two online sessions (2 hours in total). The physical phase includes various activities: welcome and information on group work dynamics, lectures and roundtables on journalistic practice in situations of crisis and emergency, teamwork to prepare summaries and presentations about different topics, visits to Doñana Natural Park (The Acebuche Visitor Centre), the 112 Andalusia Emergency Coordination Centre, NGO's that provide assistance to immigrants such as Sevilla Acoge and Fundación SAMU, UME (Military Emergency Unit) Headquarters in Morón de la Frontera, as well as a cultural visit to Seville.

At the end of each lecture or roundtable, students, under the supervision of the faculty members, will meet and work in groups to address the discussions presented in each presentation and prepare a summary of each day. The closing session of the programme will include the presentation of the summaries prepared by each student group, who will choose a representative for this purpose, and a plenary debate (faculty members and students) about the central theme of the course: media coverage of crises and emergencies in the current global scenario. Finally, the conclusions will be presented and approved by the plenary for the preparation of the final memorandum including a handbook of crisis reporting as the main collaborative result of the course.

- Course content:
 - The role of media in the coverage of crises and emergencies
 - Reporting about natural disasters, climate change and environmental issues
 - Reporting about public health crises
 - Reporting about migrant and refugee crisis, and humanitarian concerns

- Reporting about security and defense at a time of geopolitical instability
- Learning Outcomes:
 - Through a combination of interactive in-person sessions with transnational and multidisciplinary teams coming from participating Ulysseus universities, students will be able to develop a solid understanding of the role and social responsibility of media outlets in the current information landscape facing the spread of disinformation and their big challenges regarding the coverage of crises and emergencies that have a decisive impact on shaping public opinion and on coexistence among citizens.

Physical Mobility:

The physical mobility part will be running from 16 to 21 November in Seville. The focus of the seminar is the analysis of the keys and main challenges of media outlets in the coverage of situations of crisis that may affect the normal functioning of European societies. Please note that this programme is subject to change due to availability of scheduled visits.

Virtual Component/Part:

The virtual phase of this course consists of two online sessions (one hour each). The first one (10/11/2026) will be a preparatory meeting between the organization, the invited teachers, and the students. In this session the main issues and discussions addressed in the course will be presented. Likewise, in this phase, students could be introduced to the fundamentals of crisis reporting in the current information ecosystem. In this case, student will individually do a pre-exercise that will consist of analysing the given information and showing their knowledge through an online task or quiz. The second session (29/11/2026) will address the conclusions and the preparation of a final memorandum including a handbook of crisis reporting as the main collaborative result of the course.

Requirements:

The programme is particularly aimed at Journalism and Communication undergraduate students and Master's and PhD researchers interested in expanding their knowledge about reporting, communication, media production, social issues and journalism ethics; all this from an interdisciplinary approach and from an international perspective under the Ulysseus umbrella. Knowledge of English B2 is required. Additional European language skills are very welcome.

Preference for Master's and PhD. Also final Bachelor students are also eligible for admission. Academic Staff are eligible for admission too.
